POETRY.

Are few, but deep and solemn, and they break Fresh from the fount of feeling.—Perceval.

For the Columbian Fountain.

A LOVE RHYME.

I never loved but one,
But O, how pure the flame I felt for her, that still will burn Throughout this life the same;
I almost worshipped her,
And all unconscious came Delirious words that passion urged, My trembling tongue to name,
The while in those deep eyes I gazed, And rapture thrilled my frame.

She came—I saw—I loved.

Perchance she loved me not.

And though stern fate has bid us part,
She ne'er can be forgot.

The time so sweetly spent With her is like a spot Of green amid the waste to bless The weary wanderer's lot;

When all around bleak sands are spread,
And the air is close and hot.

I never loved but one,
Nor can I love again.

While memory keeps her from her seat,
The trial were in vain;

For still within my breast Her image doth remain,
And, like a mighty queen, therein She evermore will reign.

And still will sway the sea of thought, As Luna sways the main.

Perchance one day we'll meet,
And she will learn from me,
The value of a loving heart—And long-remembered woe.

Then were I truly blest, And cares, like clouds would flee; Though gloomy lowered the morn of love, All bright the eve would be.

As after storms the rainbow comes,
And the sun shines gloriously.

W. L. S.

THE FISHERMAN.

A THRILLING INCIDENT.

It was as calm an evening as ever came from Heaven—the sky and the earth were as tranquil as if the storm from the one had never disturbed the repose of the other; and even the ocean, that great highway of the world—lay as gentle as if no traveller ever sunk to death in its embrace. The sun had gone down, and the pensive twilight would have reigned over nature, but for the moon which rose in full-orbed beauty, the queen of an illimitable world, to smile upon the goodly things of ours, and to give a radiance and glory to all she shone upon. It was an hour and scene that had led the soul to the contemplation of Him who never ceases to watch over the works he has made, and whose protecting care displays itself alike upon the solid land and the trackless waste of the deceitful sea.

On the Western coast of the county of Devon, which has been termed, and it may be added justly, the garden of England, upon such an evening a group had assembled around one of the fisherman's cottages.— The habitation was built in the style of the olden time, when comfort was the principal object of the proprietor. At either side of the door were scattered the lines and nets and baskets, that betokened the calling of the owner, and the fisherman was taking his farewell for the night of his happy loving family, who were bidding him Godspeed on his voyage. A fine old man was leaning his arm on the railing and talking to an interesting girl whose hand lay upon the shoulder of a younger sister. The stout fisherman, dressed in his rough jerkin, and large boots that reached far above the knees, was in the act of kissing a little cherub, who seemed half terrified at being elevated to his father's lips while his wife and mother, with her infant nursing on her lap, was looking anxiously upon her husband as she breathed the parting, and the prayer for his safe return. A little boy, the miniature of his father in countenance and dress, bearing a huge cloak across his shoulder, and the lantern that was to give light when the moon departed, completed the group—if we except a Newfoundland dog, some steps in advance of the party, watching for a nod to commence his march to a kind of a pier where the fisherman and the boy were to embark.

"Good luck, good luck!" exclaimed the old man, "good luck and safe home again, John, ye want no more but God's blessing, and that ye shall have for a king, but ye may as well take mine, too—God bless ye, and good bye to ye."

The blessing was heartily echoed by his partner and his children, and whistling as he went, his boat hook on his shoulder, his dog Neptune before, and his boy following, he trudged along to the beach.

With the earliest dawn of the morning the fisherman's family were astir; the elder girl was busily arranging their little parlor, while the younger was arranging the breakfast table, and the mother spreading before the fire the clothes of her husband and her boy. An hour passed, and she grew somewhat uneasy, that he had remained abroad beyond the usual period of his return. Another hour had elapsed, when she said to her father, "Father, go out to the hillock, and try if you can see his sail upon the water; he seldom stays out so long when the sea is calm and the weather is fair; my little boy," she continued, "was not quite well last night, and this alone should have hastened his return."

The old man went forth, and one by one his grand children followed him, until the mother was left alone, rocking the cradle of her unconscious babe. After the lapse of another hour, her daughter entered with the news that a neighbor had spoken to her father in the night, and that he would certainly soon be home.

"God grant it!" said she, and she spoke in a tone of deep anxiety; "he was never away so long but once, that was when he saved the crew of the ship Mary; and then the whirl of the sinking ship well nigh made his grave."

Again she stirred the fire, again arranged the clothes before it, and poured some hot water into the tea-cups. Still the breakfast remained untouched.

The sun was now soaring to its meridian height when once more the family assembled in their humble dwelling; the prop of the whole was yet wanting. They sat down to a cheerless meal, the seats at either side of the wife remaining vacant. The old man was the only individual who appeared to anticipate no evil; but he hastily finished his breakfast and went forth.

The noon was rapidly passing, and the sun had already given tokens of the glory of his departure, when the fisherman's wife having lulled her infant to sleep, went herself to the hill that commanded an extensive view of the wide spread ocean. All the little household soon assembled on the spot, but no boat was seen upon the waters—nothing that could give hope except the appearance of the waves, which looked too placid to be dangerous.

To be continued.

A SELFISH AGE.

It is true, perhaps, that we are deformed, by no gigantic vices, in the present age—that men do not commit the crimes that were so frightful in the French Revolution —causing the air to rain blood, and the very earth to heave with the fires of a moral desolation—but this condition of utter enormity is not necessary to cause us to sigh and mourn over the degeneracy of our species, and invoke the better spirit of our nature, to a timely reform. Too many believe that there is nothing to reform in society, as long as the stupendous atrocities of villany, do not horrify us by their hourly perpetration. To show the fallacy of this reasoning, we have only to trace the pre-existing state of morals, which in countries shaken by revolutions, have been the uniform forerunners of social explosions. Prior to 1790, what was the state of French society? Men could then exclaim, as we do now, we have nothing to reform, because we are cursed by no gigantic crimes. Every thing at that era of moral corruption, was soft, bland, venial, and refined. No violence shocked good taste. No enormities startled the world with horror. All was calm, beautiful, polished. But it was the age of petty and silent vice, that was active in breeding the gigantic crimes that followed. Had the French seen the necessity of a reform prior to their Revolution, they would have averted the explosion that crushed them beneath the weight of an accumulation of petty vices, all ending in one grand performance of human tragedy. A sensual age begets a hollow-hearted generation. All feeling, all humanity, all charity, all love, is lost and overwhelmed in the cold selfishness of a voluptuous and vicious generation. Unhallowed enjoyments prepare the minds of a people for unnatural crimes, by rendering them callous, cruel, and unfeeling. The silent corruption that eats away the moral stamina of a people, gives no shock, but that moral stamina once destroyed, gigantic passions break out, and colossal crimes take the place of petty vices. The great art of moral preservation lies in averting the habit of selfish enjoyment. Minds once thoroughly selfish, have no mercy, no clemency, no sympathy for others. Selfish enjoyment made Nero a monster, Tiberius a hyena, and Domitian a tiger. Political oppression may accelerate the revolution which convulses communities in the giant throes of unrestrained passion —but the principle of retribution is silently at work in every moral system, that is infected by vicious and sensual selfishness.
All vice is nothing but unmixed selfishness —and when the mind loses the power of sympathy, it lies exposed to the inroads of all the giant passions, without compunction or remorse.—Phil. Sun.
